Chapter 1: Embers of a Broken Crown

Preface

The story of Westeros has captivated hearts and imaginations for generations, weaving a tapestry of heroes, villains, and the ever-shifting sands of power. In writing Shadows Over Westeros: The New Dawn, my aim was to delve into the uncertain world left behind after the Iron Throne's collapse—a realm both familiar and uncharted. This book seeks to explore how new legends may rise and ancient threats may return, inviting readers to journey with both new and old faces as history is rewritten. Thank you for joining me on this new adventure into the heart of Westeros.

Acknowledgments

A heartfelt thank you to my family and friends, whose support and encouragement have been steadfast as the Wall itself. To the beta readers who braved these shadowed pages before the dawn, your insight and honesty helped shape every chapter. Finally, to all the lovers of epic tales who continue to wander Westeros in their dreams, this story is for you.

Introduction

The Iron Throne is no more. From its ashes, a fractured realm struggles to find order as power-hungry lords maneuver and new alliances are forged in secret. Old grudges flare; loyalties are tested. But far to the north, beyond rumor and reason, something ancient stirs—a darkness unvanquished, patient and cold. In this dawn, the game has changed, but the stakes are just as deadly. Prepare to walk the broken kingdoms, where every decision could tilt the balance of fate and legend hangs upon the choices of those who remain.

Chapter 1

Embers of a Broken Crown

Embers of a Broken Crown may matter more than most people realize.

A lingering chill clung to the shattered towers of King's Landing, stubborn as the winter that refused to yield. Once, these streets had pulsed with the restless energy of lords and merchants, of commoners chasing fleeting hopes beneath the Iron Throne's shadow. Now, only crows crowded the sky, feasting on the remains of ambition.

Lord Mandon Harrow stood beneath his battered standard—a black stag rampant on silver, tattered by fire and wind—as he surveyed the Red Keep's ruined hall. The Iron Throne too had fallen, a melted relic twisted by dragonfire, more memory than seat. Mandon's grip tightened around his sword. Soon, the council would gather, and already their whispers slithered through the corridors like rats hungry for scraps. Who would wear a crown when the old order was nothing but ash?

A sharp knock broke the hush. Lady Ysella Blackwood slipped in, her raven-feather cloak brushing the floor, dark eyes lingering on every hidden corner. 'Lord Harrow,' she greeted, her voice smooth and cool. 'The lords assemble, yet none bring loyalty—only knives.'

'And what do you bring, Lady Ysella?'

She offered a slow, knowing smile. 'A warning. From the North.'

Mandon's hand paused, tense. The North had haunted the capital in rumor for weeks—strange lights, beasts found frozen and mutilated near Winter Town, children gone beyond the Wall. He'd dismissed such talk as fireside fears, but Ysella's presence made the tales harder to ignore.

'Lady Sable Stark has sent ravens,' Ysella said, her gaze unwavering. 'She fears something old is stirring in the snow. She pleads for aid—unity. But the southern lords bicker and bleed.'

Mandon's jaw tightened. 'The South has rarely ridden for the North's sake, not since the Long Night. Why break that habit now?'

'Because darkness may not care for banners or broken crowns,' Ysella replied quietly.

Others trickled into the chamber. Lord Martyn Tyrell, green cloak caked in road-mud, kept his chin high but eyes wary. Ser Varric Lannister followed, his gold hair dulled by dust, suspicion sharpening every glance. Rew Blackmyre, somber as winter dusk, hovered near the hearth, silent and watching.

Discord was thick in the air. Old feuds gnawed at any pretense of unity; every glance weighed threat against opportunity.

'We have no king, no queen—only warlords and ghosts,' Martyn Tyrell declared. He tried for bravado, but his voice quivered, betraying all.

Varric Lannister drummed restless fingers on the table. 'Whoever holds King's Landing will shape what comes next. That's the only road.'

'Or damn us all,' muttered Rew Blackmyre, gaze fixed on Ysella as if weighing ancient omens.

'Lady Stark's warnings are not children's tales,' Ysella pressed. 'If the North falls, the shadow could sweep all the way to Oldtown.'

The words hung, heavy as frost. The great houses had always survived on blood and cunning, but what if something colder was coming, something beyond threats and coin?

Mandon stood, voice low and sure. 'So, do we fight over the bones of a broken throne, or do we listen to the warning from the dark?'

No one answered. The silence was thick, broken only by the wind sighing through shattered windows—a lonely reminder of the world outside and the danger waiting in every falling star.

Afterword

As the shadows stretch ever longer across Westeros, its fate hangs in the balance—not upon a single throne, but in the choices of those who remain. The story of the Seven Kingdoms has always been one of resilience, defiance, and the hope that outlives the darkest of nights. In these fractured lands, the bonds of loyalty, the courage to heed warnings, and the willingness to face the unknown will shape legends anew. Thank you for accompanying these characters through uncertainty and peril as a new dawn rises, fragile and fierce, over Westeros.
